Virginia Farm Bureau Head Blasts Government Spending

ROANOKE Dec. 9 -Farmers are committed to greater productivity, and are prepared to take their share of budget cuts during "this current recession of uncertain dimensions."

"We must come to grips with inflation," Robert B Delano, Virginia Farm Bureau president, told the opening session of the 49th annual VFBF convention here this morning.

The Virginia farm leader blasted federal spending, government barriers to productivity, and skyrocketing health care costs.

"Congress should stop telling people that government spending is uncontrollable, and that it is not practical to make real cuts in the federal budget. We must control government spending," Delano declared.

On the issue of public health, Delano called for an investigation of the management of the state's medicaid program. He said that the entire program may be run more efficiently and at less cost to ushers if run by the private sector rather than state government.

He told members of Virginia's largest farm organization that agriculture remains the nation's largest industry with assets of $371.1 billion.

"Our industry is willing to commit for greater productivity in behalf of our national interst," he said. "We are prepared to take our cuts - any part of an across the board effort to eliminate deficit government spending. We challenge others – business, labor and government – to commit their resources to greater productivity at less cost.

"We are not likely to solve the current recession without attacking the cause of today's double digit inflation," he added. He said 80 percent of today's inflation came from deficit government spending.

Delano did express "appreciation for the courage exhibited by Gov. Godwin for directing all state agencies to reduce operating costs by 5 to 8 percent."

Delano told convention delegates that Farm Bureau has

Vocational Educatiuon - Filling A Vital Need

Learning A Basic Skill

George Almond, right, instructs students on proper method to read level during Brick Masonry class at Appomattox County High School. Class is part of school system's vast vocation educational program.

To often vocational education has been overlooked in urban areas, and under emphasized in some rural areas.

Such is not the case in Appomattox County where nearly 80 per cent of the students in the high school are enrolled in one form or another of vocational education.

In what is perhaps the best rounded and most complete vocational education program offered in the state of Virginia, Appomattox County's public school system offers courses ranging from the manual trades to business, food service and child care.

At a time when it is becoming increasing difficult for students to enroll at colleges and universities it is refreshing to see that our county school board and administrators have been far sighted enough to prepare young people entering the labor market to be self-supporting, and qualified for employment.

A misconception that only academic failures are relegated to the vocational courses is quickly proven wrong when one listens to Joel D. Martin, instructor of power mechanics and advisor to the Appomattox chapter of the Vocational-Industrial Club of America (VICA).

Martin says, "I agree that not every student is capable of being a scholar, but we feel that if a student is an academic failure, he will also be a failure in the vocational courses. We have honor students enrolled in our vocational courses. We think we have something to offer every student, whether they are headed for college, work on a farm or entering business or industry."

Mrs. Celia Beamer, an instructor in the business courses, is another who scoffs at the idea that only poor students choose vocational courses. "We have a good cross section of students enrolled in the business courses. We believe that typing, records' keeping and telephone techniques are essential to all graduating students. Some students are more oriented toward vocational, or practical, business while others are taking the courses as preparation for college."

Donald Torrence, head of the agriculture section agrees. "We have a well rounded agricultural program here. We have productive farming, farm mechanics, machinery service and horticulture. No matter where a student's interest is directed, we believe that we can give him the type of instruction to prepare him for entry to college, or for the labor market," Torrence explains.

Richard Carter, Director of Vocational Educational Instruction for the county school system is proudly optimistic about the future of students leaving Appomattox County High School for higher education and for entry into the labor force.

Carter says, "With the completion of our new high school a student has more flexibility in selecting a vocational program. We offer mechanics, brick laying, conservation, business programs and distributive education. We feel that our graduating students are prepared for whatever they choose, whether it be college or career."

Carter adds, "Although we do not have an employment center for graduating students, we do work very closely with people in industry and business to try to find jobs for the students who do not wish to continue in higher education. We believe that students leaving our vocational programs are as well prepared as they would be if they were leaving a trade school or business college."

Central Virginia Tomorrow Workshop Slated Dec. 19

Some 107 Central Virginia citizens participated in the Central Virginia Tomorrow seminar held December 3 at Lynchburg College where they discused two of the region's top priorities, housing and education.

The priorities were determined by citizens attending a two-day conference in Blackburg last October and were further discussed at jurisdictional workshops in the district.

The jurisdictional workshop for Appomattox County is scheduled to be conducted Dec. 19 from 10 a.m. to 2: p.m. in the auditorium at A p p o m attox County High School.

The workshop is part of a regionwide public and private effort to set county objectives and goals for the next 5 to 15 years. It's a look at where we are, and where we propose to go.

"Lunch will be served at the school cafeteria therefore it's important that we have a count of who will be attending," J. A. Smith, workshop chairman, said. Call 352-8244 if you plan to have lunch with the group. Lunch will be 55c.

Citizens will have an opportunity to have an input into objectives and goals at the work group sessions. Work group leaders are Mrs. Virginia Babcock, Richard Carter, and Tommy Mathews.

The public is cordially invited to attend and participate in this program.

The purpose of the Dec. 3 seminar was to show the interaction of one issue to another and the considerations which must be made in developing strategies to solve problems.

Participants in the seminar, which included delegates to the October conference and some workshop participants, were divided into eight discussion groups. Four of the groups discussed housing and the other four discussed education with a comparison following to show the various considerations each group had determined in its discussion.

Leo Molinaro, a consultant with the American City Corporation who is assisting in Central Virginia Tomorrow - A Partnership Process, pointed out to the group four different ways to plan for community growth and change: reactive planning, problem avoidance, opportunistic planning and the goals-setting approach.

According to Molinaro, the goals-setting approach offers the best opportunity to plan in advance for the type of development a community wants.

Central Virginia Tomorrow was organized for the purpose of providing citizens with the opportunity to determine priorities of the area and then to begin planning to meet those priorities.

Appomattox NHP To Host "Civil War Christmas"

Christmas, a time of peace, has come to Appomattox where peace and reunion are words of special meaning. To help celebrate this Christmas season and because of its close relationship with a significant peace event Appomattox Court House NHP is hosting a special "Civil War Christmas" on the evening of Saturday, December 21.

The evening will begin at 7:30 p.m. with a massed interdenominational church choir, leading everyone in a forty-five minute selection of Christmas Carols. At the conclusion of the caroling the village will be open to the public until 10:00 p.m. Lit and decorated as it might have been in 1865, the village will come to life taking everyone present back to a time of candles, fireplaces, and a "natural" Christmas spirit.
